

The Dark Side Of Do'Naar

How It All Began

The Dark Side Of Do'Naar, though part 5 of the saga, was the first story to be written. However, it was not originally meant to exist as a story, nor was it going to be part of a saga. The Dark Side Of Do'Naar was originally supposed to be a fan film, made by myself and some of my friends. The would-be film and its characters were heavily inspired by the computer game Jedi Outcast, which I had been playing a lot during 2002 along with Mr. Krig. We had even used pictures of our faces to create skins of ourselves to use within the game.

Jedi Knights Macan Vesso and Wilcra Li New:

The decision to make a film was made in November 2002. A rough story was soon completed, though the first draft of the script could not be completed until we knew exactly where we stood on a technical standpoint. Just what could we accomplish with home video equipment? To answer this question we did some experimenting, including a fully edited saber duel by myself and my bro over the nearby Cannock Chase.

We discovered that we could apply effects on top of video footage that looked alright, had no worries about sound and dubbing, and could even seemingly create surprisingly good 3D animation usable for space combat. However, there was one problem we could not get around and it was a big one: any blue/green screen work we did was just not acceptable. The picture quality of MiniDV cameras was just not good enough at all. The only way to get around this was to spend a whole heap of cash we didn't have on a much better video camera. And without blue/green keying ability, there was no way to accurately recreate a Star Wars feel. So unfortunately we had to abandon the film.

From there it was almost a year later when I decided I wanted to have this story finished in some way, whatever way it may be, and got stuck into the writing. Though I realized that without the limitations of film I could now completely change everything and let my imagination run loose, I decided to try and stay with the original essence of the story. A few things have changed for the better, mainly three entirely new chapters at the beginning, as the film was going to begin from what is essentially chapter 4 in the finished story. It was also good to be able to change a lot of the characters to non-humans, as all except the character of Raelag were going to be human.

FAQ

When are the stories set?

The stories are (or eventually will be) set around 20 to 30 years after the original Star Wars film.

How true are they to real Star Wars history?

Honest answer is I'm not exactly sure. I've only read a few of the novels set after the classic trilogy. I've looked through timelines to try and get things right, but mostly they are influenced by the Jedi Knight series of computer games.

Where are the stories set?

The stories are set all over the galaxy. There are a lot of well known planets as well as planets I have created. The main planet I suppose is the moon of Yavin IV, where the Jedi Academy is situated.

What characters are in the stories?

The subject of characters is a tricky one. You play around with fan favourites and you can annoy people. This is why most of the characters have been made up. But some classic icons make frequent cameos, such as Luke and Kyle Katarn.

Why start with part 5? Trying to copy Lucas, eh?

Simple. It wasn't part 5 when I started to write it. The basic story for The Dark Side Of Do'Naar was created in November 2002, when myself and several friends started to make a fan film. The film was never finished, but I really wanted to finish the story so I did. Of course, this then got me thinking of sequels and prequels. I only wish it wouldn't take me so long to write each one.

Does that Macan character look like you?

Well it's supposed to. The Jedi Knight skins of Macan and Li New were made from pictures of myself and Mr Krig. These skins were the inspiration for the characters we were going to play in the film that never made it. Other characters were created simply because our other friends wanted to be in the film. Mr Gallear wanted to be a Zabrak like Darth Maul, so that is where the Raelag character came from. A workmate's son wanted to be in it so we gave Li New a Padawan. My bro wanted to be in it so we created Codan, and there were others. All these characters stuck when I wrote the story, even though I didn't have to do it that way.
